

		thus, it may enhance the probability of victory and along with it raise propensity of candidacy. Having a job may influence negatively the interest to run for an office, if you have to take care of children and housekeeping alone, without the support of a partner who could share responsibilities.
Associative participation	Yes, no	Engaging in collective action, as much as having a career, gives more visibility and may even attract media attention. Therefore, participating in associations should heighten probability of winning an election, together with more willingness to compete. Participation in associations could influence negatively the interest to run for an office, if you have to take care of children and housekeeping alone, without the support of a partner who could share responsibilities.
Level of involvement with association	High, medium, low	The higher the person engages collectively, the higher his or her visibility and support will be. Higher visibility and support attracts more probability of winning elections. People who perceive more probability of victory should be more eager to apply for elections than those who do not.
Expected Support from family in case of candidacy	Yes, no	Support from family cuts down the costs of being a candidate. Lower costs, higher propensity to candidacy.